

Multi-modal interaction for communication and language development.

Gayle Porter

Short Abstract

Children generally learn to communicate as they attempt to understand others and be understood during interactions in their daily life. We all continue to use multiple modes of communication as we interact throughout life. This presentation will explore the importance of multi-modal interactions, including gestural and aided AAC modes, to support communication and language development for individuals who have complex communication needs.

Long Abstract

Children generally learn to communicate as they attempt to understand others and be understood during interactions in their daily life. We all continue to use multiple modes of communication as we interact throughout life. This presentation will explore the importance of multi-modal interactions, including gestural and aided AAC modes, to support communication and language development for individuals who have complex communication needs.